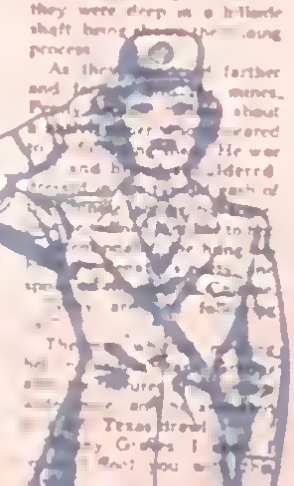
NO TIME FOR TORTURE

By RICHARD K. GORDON

When pretty WAC Lieutenant Penny Graves finds herself imprisoned by ruthless Japs in a temple trap, she decides it's time to start kicking the gang around . . .



THE KHAKI [illegible] Army car [illegible] the [illegible] Overhead Chinese [illegible] planes droned. In the car were two Americans WAC Lieutenant Penny Graves, and U. S. Senator John Harmon.

"Where to now?" [illegible] Penny Graves of her [illegible] gushed passenger.

The silver haired Senator consulted his maps and [illegible]. "Our next stop Penny," he answered. "[illegible] be the Chantung Iron Mines!"

"Chantung Mines it is, sir!" Penny saluted jauntily threw the big car in gear and in a moment they were off down the road in an acrid cloud of dust.

Two weeks before the WAC officer had been assigned as chauffeur to drive Senator Harmon on a [illegible] new War Industry Preshipment he knew of congress the Senator wanted to make his inspection without a lot of fanfare and ceremony that might prevent him from getting a clear picture of the situation. Penny had proven a great help to him and now the survey was almost over with but a few mountain mines and foundries still to be visited.

They reached Chantung late in the afternoon. Jagged mountains cast purple shadows over lines of toiling laborers and hand drawn ore carts. Penny explained the Senator's mission to the Chinese officials in charge and soon they were deep in a hillside shaft being shown the [illegible] process.

As they [illegible] farther and farther [illegible] mines. Penny [illegible] about [illegible] suddenly [illegible] He was [illegible] and [illegible] soldiers [illegible] rush of [illegible] Texas [illegible] Penny Graves I [illegible] don't you [illegible] Penny [illegible] Captain [illegible] Thomas [illegible] "Agent [illegible]

The Japanese officers have taken [illegible] of prison camp [illegible] make sure [illegible] happened to the [illegible] they were captured. So they [illegible] me up in this [illegible] and I'm supposed to follow you around. Better hurry and catch up to the Senator! Nobody suspected [illegible]"

Penny [illegible] apprehendingly [illegible] Tex," she whispered [illegible] my eyes open for the Japs, too!"

THE NEXT morning, Senator Harmon announced that his job was finished.

"Penny, I've got a good overall picture to take back to the States with me." He smiled at his pretty assistant. "And now how about taking us the country fair down a Chantung village? The mine chiefs say it's pretty good!"

Penny hesitated. The Japs were still at large. But she considered Tex Riley was on guard and any Jap who could get past that ex cowpuncher would have to be a slick [illegible] indeed.

Her face brightened. "I'd love to go, Senator!"

Hours later they wandered through the noisy, laughing crowds at the Little country fair visiting all the sideshows—the magicians, wrestlers, knife throwers, puppet shows. As they started to go into an acrobat's tent, Penny's eye was caught by a squatting peddler. Puzzled she stared at him for a moment then choked with laughter. It was Tex Riley again, in a new disguise. Still watching for those three escaped Jap officers!

Inside the dark tent Penny and Senator Harmon watched the three acrobats displaying their skill.

Suddenly there was a loud explosion at the back of the tent. Senator Harmon whirled catching Penny's arm. The tent was burning! In a moment a dense cloud of heavy black smoke filled the [illegible]

"We've got to get out of here!" cried the Senator.

One of the acrobats suddenly loomed up through the black. "Quick this way out," he called, catching at Penny's arm. "Through the back! Hurry, please!"

The two Americans followed him under the platform. He caught at the tent flap, gestured for them to go first. Penny stooped to go through, and in the dim, all kinds of fireworks seemed to go off. There was a shattering crash, and then she felt herself slipping to the earth. Everything blurred into unconsciousness.

THERE WAS a steady throbbing pain in Penny's head as she awoke. Half rising, she looked about herself. She was in a brightly lighted, stone walled chamber. And there in a corner of the room, was Senator Harmon, just beginning to stir.

She ran to him and knelt by his side.

"Senator Harmon! Are you all right?"

The statesman shook his head groggily. His eyes cleared and he looked around the room.

"I—I guess so, Penny. But where are we and how did we get here?" He looked up. There seemed to be some kind of a bell tower overhead with a bamboo ladder leading up to three bronze bells. At the side of the room were stone figures, covered with rubbish.

"Why, we're in some kind of old Chandra temple," said Penny.

"Exactly, my dear! You are in the temple of Chanda!" A sibilant voice came from behind the Americans. Penny and Senator Harmon whirled. There in the doorway stood the man who had led them into the room during the fight. He was now strangely attired. He was wearing the uniform of a Japanese Major.

"May I introduce myself?" the man went on, politely. "Major Hakati of the Imperial Army at your service. And you, of course, are the American Senator John Harmon! I recognized you as soon as you came into our little show, Senator. The rest was easy."

"You mean—you started that fire and slugged us?" Penny gasped. "You're one of the escaped Jap officers! Why did you bring us here?"

Major Hakati smiled. "You see, our disguise, while momentarily successful, could not be expected to get us safely out of China. Send you, Senator Harmon, will write a note saying that you are my captive! You will ask the commanding officer of this area to provide me and my officers with a plane with sufficient gas to get us to Japanese territory and a guarantee of our being permitted to fly out safely! Well?"

The Senator spit. "Why, I—I'll see you in Hades first! you grinning monkey! No! is our answer!"

The smile left Hakati's face. "Ah, so? Then I must tell you that if you are still unwilling to write at ten o'clock tonight I will be forced to torture the girl! You have till then."

He whirled about and stalked out of the chamber. His voice floated back to them from the other side of the door. "Any attempt at escape or rescue will be most unwise. My men have guns trained on the entrance to this temple which is on a hilltop! Remember, ten tonight!"

Senator Harmon looked grimly at Penny Graves. "Penny, I'm afraid we're in a peck of trouble. Even if we get word to the American consulate here, they wouldn't be able to get to us! I must write a note that will [illegible]."

Penny looked thoughtfully up at the bell tower and the bamboo ladder. "Maybe we won't have to do that, Senator."

Night fell on the ruins of Chanda. Overhead American reconnaissance planes buzzed. But Major Hakati knew that his prisoners could not possibly get in touch with the planes. It was nine-thirty. Another half hour and the girl—

Meanwhile, Penny Graves was putting her plan into effect. With the Senator helping her, she climbed the ladder to the bell tower. Once there she grasped the old bell ropes and began to play a weird, dissonant melody. The vibrating echo of the great metal bells will hush us the [illegible] several moments later.

John Harmon scratched his head. "That Penny, sounded like nothing on earth. What was it?"

Before Penny could answer, the door burst open and the three Japanese officers charged in. Major Hakati, in the lead. Hakati leaped at Penny and struck her to the ground with a single blow.

"That bell! If you touch it again I—I—" He quickly regained control of himself. "If of course even if it could be heard, it would mean nothing. You have twenty minutes, Senator, to make up your mind."

He paused and left the room.

He was back in twenty minutes. But, even as he opened the door there was the sudden roar of planes overhead, the chatter of tommy guns, and the excited shouting of the other two Japs. In a moment, tall bronzed American paratroopers had smashed their way into the temple, rounding up the Japs. Tex Riley was at the end, waving a gun in either hand and shouting a loud "Y'prepare?"

Penny Graves fell into his arms, sobbing with relief.

"Oh, Tex! I was so afraid [illegible] hear me, and [illegible] that you [illegible] stand!"

"[illegible] what's this all about?" Senator. "How did [illegible] know we were being [illegible] this temple?"

Penny's eyes peeked out [illegible] hysterically from Riley's arms.

"Remember that tune I played on the bells, Senator?"

"Why, yes," replied John Harmon. "But I couldn't recognize it. What was it?"

"There was just one man around here who would recognize it and know what it meant," said Penny. "That tune was 'THE EYES OF TEXAS ARE UPON YOU.' It led Tex right to the temple!"
